When you create a new document, a layer for each color of the image is created, and the image becomes a raster image, meaning that each pixel (that's a picture element) is either black or white. A raster image represents the colors that make up an image in a gridlike format and in this case becomes the starting point for any image editing. The pixel format changes the way that light reflects from various colors, and in the process it creates the different shades. In the following steps, you'll turn the original image — an image that's already created in a certain format — into a raster format to make it ready to be worked on and changed using the layers and other tools in Photoshop.
