The present invention generally relates to an apparatus and method for assembling a vehicle wheel, such as a trailer wheel assembly, and, more particularly, relates to an apparatus and method for attaching a valve stem to a wheel bearing cup. Wheels, such as trailer wheels, typically require attachment of a valve stem to the wheel bearing cup prior to attachment of the wheel to a vehicle axle. The attachment procedure requires the valve stem to be inserted into a bore in the wheel bearing cup, deformed to align the bore of the wheel bearing cup to the shaft of the valve stem, and then securely held in this deformed position to prevent unthreading of the valve stem from the bore. It is necessary to prevent unthreading of the valve stem from the bore by the assembly operator. In particular, the valve stem must be securely held by the operator prior to assembly of the wheel to the vehicle axle. Therefore, prior art equipment and devices that are utilized to perform the attachment operation are not completely satisfactory. For example, some prior art assembly methods include utilizing loose nuts to attach the valve stem to the wheel bearing cup. A loose nut is disadvantageous because it can move and require additional retightening by the operator prior to the actual assembly of the wheel to the vehicle axle. Other prior art methods of attaching a wheel valve stem to a wheel bearing cup utilize a threaded member for attaching the valve stem to the wheel bearing cup. However, a threaded member is disadvantageous because it can rotate in the bore of the wheel bearing cup if the operator is careless or if other items, such as rings, retain the threaded member in the bore. As a result, the wheel valve stem can be unthreaded from the bore, and lost. Therefore, there is a need for an improved apparatus and method for attaching the valve stem to the wheel bearing cup that can securely hold the valve stem during assembly of the wheel to the vehicle axle. There is also a need for an improved apparatus and method for attaching the valve stem to the wheel bearing cup that minimizes the risk of the valve stem being inadvertently unthreaded from the bore in the wheel bearing cup and lost. According to the present invention, an apparatus for assembling a wheel valve stem to a wheel bearing cup is provided. The apparatus includes a cup having a passag 6d1f23a050
